M'KINLET'S MARVELOUS CONTROL No Une has Yet Seen a Public Exhibition of

Washington, D. C., June 17.-If these who have seen most of him since the 4th of March were asked what trait of the president's character had impressed them especially, they would say his mar volume self-control. The adjective is right. The McKinley temper is marvelous. In the four years of a presidenthe Coles Have to Show-Reds Win the tial term the first quarter is the most through the ordeal. The first evid irritation is yet to be noted. Mr. Mc-Kinley is a man of convictions. He does not hesitate to express disapproval. But he never yields to the petulance which attends upon annoyances. There have been great men in the White House, but history records explosions of passion from Washington all the way down the line to the present exception. This equipoles of Mr. McKinley is so remarkable that it has been spoken of frequently as a natural gift of great worth. The possessor has been congramlated as if it was an inheritance. The truth is this complete self-command is second. not first, nature with Mr. McKinley, 10
